Other patients passed fragments of stones, which could not be broken when pressed between the fingers, and in which several lamina; were observable. Some voided small stones entire, like those which come away after attacks of nephritic colic. Others again, who voided habitually a small round and red sand, did not void any whilst it would have been highly interesting at the time of these operations to have ascertained the nature of the stones, but chemistry was not in such an advanced state as at present: Scheele had not then published his work on the analysis of urinary calculi. using the remedy-. Very few patients passed blood in their urine, even though it had been previously bloody. Morand says also that these remedies neither disordered the appetite, the digestion, nor any of the principal functions. He observes that they generally occasion constipation, but that it has been ascertained that the powders are astringent, while the drink is of a laxative nature, and, consequently, the one may be corrected by the other, by giving more or less of either. Morand made other experiments on the action of Miss Stephens s remedy, and observed, 1. Thata piece of a calculus, put into a solution of soap, about the same temperature as the urine, and left there during a month, had lost thirty-one grains...
